Understanding Stress in the Body

Stress is considered a non-specific response of the body to any demand and a stressor is an agent that produces stress at any time in the body. These can be triggered at any time depending on a person's personality, health status or even environment triggers.

There are three predictable stages the body uses to respond to stressors, generally called stress syndrome. The first stage is the "alarm stage", which provides a burst of energy. In the second stage, known as the "resistance stage", the body attempts to resist or adapt to the stressor. The last stage is known as the "exhaustion stage" because energy is depleted. Reactions to stress are associated with enhanced secretion of a number of hormones including glucocorticoids (cortisol), catecholamines (epinephrine [adrenaline], norepinephrine [noradrenaline] and dopamine), growth hormone, and prolactin, the effect of which is to increase mobilization of energy sources and adapt the individual to its new-found circumstance. This is all part of the normal adaptive processes that maintain homeostasis through the production of mediators such as adrenalin, cortisol and other chemical messengers. These mediators of the stress response promote adaptation in the aftermath of acute stress, but they also contribute to chronic stress which is seen as wear and tear on the body and brain that results from being "stressed out."

Over activation of the stress system can lead to behavioural and peripheral changes and now, stress is frequently seen as a significant contributor to many diseases. The relationship between stress and illness is complex. The susceptibility to stress varies from person to person. Among the factors that influence the susceptibility to stress are genetic vulnerability, coping style, type of personality and social support. On-going life stress is strongly associated with poor mental and physical health. Stress-related diseases and disorders include accelerated aging, anxiety, asthma, cardiovascular disease, depression, eating disorders, gastrointestinal diseases, headaches, insomnia, memory impairment, as well as obesity.

The human body's stress system has this amazing ability to adapt to a diverse range of stressors that can be anything like catastrophic events, major life changes, daily hassles, extreme temperatures, toxicants, surgical trauma, and even physical exercise. However, our bodies were never designed to be besieged with all that the 21st century has to offer. There is a traditional wisdom that continues to use plant-based tonics to nourish the body and mind; this isn't new information as it's been used by many cultures for thousands of years.
